An independent film crew recently used the Carroll County Courthouse to shoot a scene for the upcoming movie "Postpartum," a psychological thriller.

The crew - a director, three actors and a cameraman - filmed a scene in which a detective was reporting to the sheriff about murder victims who had just been discovered.

Adam Shephard of Rochester played a detective, Steve "Papaw" Pyatte of Brownsburg played the sheriff and Don Becker of Shelbyville was the ex-FBI profiler.

"Let's do it again," said director Jim Dougherty, after the scene was rehearsed for the fifth time. "And this time I want you to look right at Don when you're dialing, as if to say, 'I've got the answer for you right here.'"

Again and again Dougherty coached, wrangled, and harangued the three men through the intense scene. The actors - in turn - bantered back and forth with ideas about how to deliver their lines and play out the scene. For a little comic relief, the men cracked jokes between takes and cut up with each other.

While the actors and director went through their paces, Randy DeFord, owner of Oak Road Multimedia of Monticello, shot the scene from six or eight different angles, trying to capture the right lighting, sound and action.

Later that day, the group traveled to just north of Rockfield to shoot a scene where the sheriff had to identify the bodies which were found in a root cellar.

"For this scene, I needed an old house in the country that looked lonely," said DeFord, "One that was at the end of a long lane. Something that set an eerie mood."
